Phone call from Col. Baird to [REDACTED]
3:25 P. M., 10 July 1952.

Baird: [REDACTED] has a tentative offer of a very good job, a job for a psychologist, and it's a job that he wants. I would like to have you call, at their expense, the man who will be concerned with hiring him or not hiring him, and I would like to have you, if possible, give Bill as good a recommendation as you can honestly do so. My personal feeling is that Bill is highly qualified for this type of job. My reasons for it are as follows: He will be dealing entirely with superiors and peers. He will not have a staff of psychologists under him. It is a job that would call on his vast operational experience as well as his psychological background, and my feeling about it is that what's happened to him here is perhaps merely a clash of personalities. I have given my unqualified recommendation and would like to feel that he might get it from you. I have recommended that you be the person contacted as knowing Bill professionally. Does that make any sense?"
